

SHERBORNE

Music Festival 2010

To celebrate the opening of the new Music School
1st and 2nd July

ALL WELCOME

THE NEW MUSIC SCHOOL
OCTOBER 2009

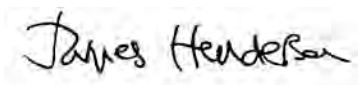

As I write this introduction for the opening of the 2010 Music School on an unseasonably cold Sunday afternoon, there have in the last three days been a typically representative number of musical events: an excellent lunchtime recital given by classical and jazz pianists took place on Friday; an exuberant and lively Concert in the Courts was given by six rock bands yesterday, and an Abbey service this morning saw the Choir singing three anthems and the whole school singing magnificently in the hymns. These events followed hot on the heels of a Swing Band performance last weekend at a local fund-raising ball in amongst two 'classical' performances in the Sherborne Abbey Festival – one involving the Chamber Orchestra and Vivaldi's Double Trumpet Concerto and another of Close Harmony. All the rehearsals for these events took place in completely unrelated venues, yet all shared equipment. Amongst many more exciting consequences, then, the brand new building – housing all music-making at Sherborne under one roof – puts an end to the [musical] furniture moving which characterises the daily life of Sherborne musicians.

The current cacophony which results from the early evening individual practice sessions from 5.00pm, or from the Swing Band rehearsing in one room whilst a flute lesson is taught in another – and whilst a pianist practises his scales in the next – has to be heard to be believed! So the major excitement of the 2010 building will be the soundproofing. At last it will be a realistic possibility for a string quartet to practise under the same roof as a RocSoc band, a jazz band, a number of boys individually practising their instruments, and a brass band: none will disturb the other, though much time in the design process has been spent ensuring that there is just enough musical 'leak' to add atmosphere and prevent sterility.

But the new Music School is more than just a collection of superbly soundproofed rooms. It is also a building which houses carefully engineered acoustic treatment in all of the different performing spaces, and which in the Simon Tindall Recital Hall is controllable and variable. The new practice rooms will encourage boys to practise even more because the spaces are inviting and will therefore inspire the commitment and dedication necessary to be good players. And with two fully equipped music classrooms, four ensemble rehearsal rooms, two soundproofed studios designed not to leak sound in or out of them at all, and a state-of-the-art recording suite linked to both of those studios and the Simon Tindall Recital Hall, this building leaves very little to be desired.

The process which led to the grand opening has been both a thrilling and surprisingly quick one. Just three and a half years ago ORMS Architects were chosen, from a shortlist of four firms of architects, for their innovative design proposal and their proven experience of working with musicians to provide a building and environment ideal for music-making. In this new building ORMS has given Sherborne's music a heart, with the airy and spacious atrium, whilst also creating something of a tardis: despite a feeling of grand height and natural light within the building, it is outside neither obtrusive nor particularly large; indeed should you be looking up Hospital Lane from the dining hall, you would be forgiven for missing the building as it nestles into the former orchard with its ground floor dug deeply into the hill.

The new building will take Sherborne's music into the 21st century. It will attract good musicians for scholarship applications: it will nurture and develop those who are here already. Music at Sherborne is for everyone and there is now a modern and enviable facility for all to enjoy.
